Lockheed Martin has announced that they will be re-incorporating in the US. The multinational is said to be "ruling out" further overseas growth. The switch will cut costs for the company, and could give them the chance to pursue new technologies. "We're not ruling out the idea of continuing to do business outside of the US, but we're making the decision to take our headquarters and our focus back to the US," explained Lockheed Martin chairman and CEO Marilyn Hewson in a press release. "It is critical to leverage the talent and intellectual capital already here in the US." The company is currently headquartered in the state of Maryland, which was the result of an original move in the late 90's. Lockheed Martin was founded in an attempt to improve upon the F-16, an American-made aircraft, and has since advanced to develop a range of other products, including F-22 stealth fighters, CH-53 transport helicopters, and the F-35 3da54e8ca3
